Preventing the Transmission of Aquatic Invasive Species When Responding to and Training for Oil Spills
Moderator: Larry Malizzi, RAMBOLL

Panelists:
- William Hazel, Marine Pollution Control
- Alan Stine, Olympus Technical Services

The transmission of aquatic invasive species (AIS) to new watersheds results in costly, long-term impacts to native ecosystems, recreational activities, hydropower generation, water diversions and other industrial activities. The movement of response equipment, including vessels, pumps, hoses, booms, skimmers, etc., can give an AIS a “free ride” to a new home. Thus, a deployment exercise or a response to an oil-spill, with a “transient” event, can inadvertently result in long-term injury to the watershed worse than what caused the spill. Through case studies, the panel will describe the AIS problem, it regulatory landscape and some practices for preventing AIS transmissions and

A dysfunctional communication style is a pattern of speaking and interacting that shuts down true connection, inhibits forward action, becomes energy draining, lowers self-esteem, and is generally destructive to relationships. In this presentation we will look at some of the dysfunctional communication styles and learn why they are so detrimental to work relationships and the overall health of an organization. How to spot them and how to turn them into functional communications.
